and has not yet been apprehended. The wound, while painful, is not dangerous.

Among the list of those attending the reunion at Richmond last week we neglected to mention "Jerd," an old time darky who served through the war with Capt. Payne, of Bath county, Va. and Mart McDowell, colored, of this place. "Jerd" has a little home on Knapps creek a few miles above Huntersville where he lives in peace and quietude. He likes to talk of the days spent with his master in that bloody struggle and many and wonderful are the stories of his escapes. At Richmond he was in his glory and it is said he delivered a number of Democratic speeches throughout the city. Many were the sheckels that fell into his palm.

A great many of the Confederate veterans and sons of veterans of this county attended the Reun-pleasant trip. The city was crowded with veterans from all the Southern states and it was said the crowd was one of the largest that was ever in the city, so large that a great many persons had trouble in securing accommodations. The parade on Thursday, from near capital square out to where the Stewart monument was unveiled was one of the largest parades ever in the city and consisted of both infantry and cavalry. The military companies of Richmond took part in this parade. On Monday the Jeff Davis monument was enveiled and on each day and night during the Reunion something of interest was provided for the entertainment of the visitors.

Col. A. C. L. Gatewood, of Linwood, returned Tuesday from Richmond. Returning visitors to the Reunion report that no finer looking officer appeared in the parade on that occasion than did the distinguished soldier from Pocahontas county. He was an officer in the Bath Cavalry and is well known by a number of the soldiers in the Southern army as a brave and gallant officer. He was wounded on several occasions.
